Decolonising Speculative Fiction

Postcolonial Studies Association Newsletter

June 2018
#21

Table of Contents

Editors’ Introduction. Isabelle Hesse and Edward Powell. 4

Articles

Living and Dying Countries: Ecocide, Consciousness & Agency in First Nations Futurism. Mykaela Saunders. 7

Indian Fantasy Fiction in English and the Post-Millennial Moment. E. Dawson Varughese. 10

‘Runaway Cyclone,’ Or: The First Bengali Science Fiction Story. Christin Hoene. 13

‘Now I prefer to get to the heart of the matter, to not use metaphor’: Hassan Blasim and Iraqi Science Fiction. Sinéad Murphy. 16

Filipino Futures: An Introduction to Philippine Science Fiction. Vida Cruz. 19

Cultural Heritage, Future Vision. Mark Bould. 23

Speculative Liberty ‘with a Slant’: Decolonizing Sovereignty through Irony in Vizenor’s Treaty Shirts. Cathy Covell Waegner. 25

Decolonising Speculative Fiction in South Africa. Alan Muller. 30

The Twisted Mirror: The Postcolonial in Dean Francis Alfar’s ‘L’ Aquilone Du Estrellas.’ Roy Tristan Agustin. 33

PSA Funding Reports

On Zapatismo and the Technological Character of Technology. Rodrigo Liceaga Mendoza. 38
Book Reviews

So Long Been Dreaming: Postcolonial Science Fiction and Fantasy, edited by Nalo Hopkinson and Uppinder Mehan. Reviewed by Andrew Stones.

Iraq+100: Stories From a Century After the Invasion, edited by Hassan Blasim. Reviewed by Annie Webster.

PSA News

- CFP Next PSA Newsletter (#22)
- PSA Membership
- Notes
We are very excited to write the editorial for our first special issue of the PSA newsletter – Decolonising Speculative Fiction. We had a fantastic response to our CFP and received a number of great contributions that explore the topic of decolonising speculative fiction (SF) – what that means, how it is happening, and why it should be of interest to postcolonial critics.

SF, of course, isn’t written only by white people: this has been the case ever since the genre’s emergence during the height of European imperialism. All too often, though, the history of white SF has overshadowed those of African SF, of South Asian SF, of South American SF, and of the many Indigenous SFs.

Beginning with Nalo Hopkinson and Uppinder Mehan’s ground-breaking anthology So Long Been Dreaming (2002) the last twenty-five years have seen increasing attention among academics, cultural gatekeepers, and mainstream metropolitan audiences to SF written from beyond the small space of white Euro-America.[1] 2011 saw a notable milestone, when Nigerian-American author Nnedi Okorafor won the World Fantasy Award for her 2010 novel Who Fears Death: look out for HBO’s forthcoming adaptation, to be produced by George R.R. Martin. The success of Marvel’s 2018 film adaptation of The Black Panther was unexpected but hugely encouraging, as Afrofuturism found mainstream appeal.[2]

And yet, the producers of Star Wars: The Force Awakens (2015) were met with thousands of accusations of promoting ‘white genocide’, simply for casting John Boyega and Lupita N’yongo in starring roles.[3] Meanwhile, the Hugo Awards have faced ‘concerted campaigns’ against nominations that are ‘overtly to the Left’.[4] More generally, white SF remains overrepresented in literature, while in film, television, and other visual media, white protagonists continue to dominate.

The reduction of literary history to the contributions of whites; the subsequent overrepresentation of white voices and imaginations, past and present; a group of writers and critics contesting this overrepresentation by recovering histories of SF beyond its hegemonic Eurowestern branch, while also reinventing the genre itself by drawing upon other cultural resources and historical experiences; and a subsequent reactionary pushback from the dominant group. This will sound all too familiar to scholars of postcolonial literature and culture.

But there are more fundamental reasons why the decolonisation of SF might be of particular interest to postcolonial studies. Consider Graham Huggan’s description of the field’s ‘capacity to undertake a critical exploration of the territorial imperatives of colonialism, and its frequently speculative consideration of alternatives to these imperatives’. [5] The term ‘postcolonialism’ itself – so maligned for misrepresenting the neocolonial present – is speculative, invoking a possibility that remains unrealized. Like SF, then, postcolonialism is concerned not just with how the world currently is, but also what it could be like.

Meanwhile, as Okorafor has noted, SF ‘carries the potential to change the world. Literally. It has changed the world’ [6]. Many of the world-changing technologies developed over the last century were inspired by SF. The genre has shaped the future, by shaping what we imagine the future to be, or what we want it to be – and thus, by extension, the Utopian desires that drive technological innovation and social change. Decolonising SF ensures that the futures the genre helps produce aren’t marked by a grossly unequal distribution of political, economic, and cultural power that favours whites.

The contributions to this special issue take up the theme of decolonising SF in various ways: some recover the histories of SF beyond its white Eurowestern branch; while others consider what futures and alternative presents Indian, African, Filipino, and Indigenous SF imagine, and how they differ to those imagined by Eurowestern writers.

Mykaela Saunders’s article gives an overview of SF in an Australian Indigenous context, and discusses how recent texts have engaged with notions of ecocide, consciousness, and agency. Olukotun’s novel After the Flare (2017) presents a vision of the future rooted in Nigerian cultural heritage.

E. Dawson Varughese examines SF in India, with particular focus on the post-millennial novel and its relationship with Indian mythology and fantasy.

Christin Hoene’s article explores how the first Bengali SF work – Jagadish Chandra Bose’s short story ‘Niruddesher Kahini’ (‘Runaway Cyclone’) – brings together science fiction and magical realism.

Sinéad Murphy considers how Iraqi SF images the future through the example of a recent anthology edited by Hassan Blasim – Iraq+100: Stories from a Century After the Invasion (2015) – which is also reviewed by Annie Webster in the book review section of this newsletter.

Vida Cruz gives us an overview of the state of Philippine science fiction, with a particular focus on its post-colonial and post-imperial history; while Mark Bould discusses how Nigerian-American Deji Bryce... and Uppinder Mehan’s So Long Been Dreaming: Postcolonial Science Fiction and Fantasy (Arsenal Pulp Press, 2004); Annie Webster discusses Hassan Blasim’s Iraq + 100 (Comma Press, 2015); and Rebecca Macklin reads Grace Dillon’s Walking the Clouds: An Anthology of Indigenous Science Fiction (University of Arizona Press, 2012) for us. Finally, this issue also includes reports from Sibendu Chakraborty and Rodrigo Liceaga Mendoza, both of whom received PSA funding in 2017.

Happy reading!

References

[1] Over the last twenty-five years, various anthologies have collected SF from beyond Europe, North America, and Australasia: Dark Matter: A Century of Speculative Fiction from the African Diaspora (2001) and Dark Matter: Reading the Bones (2005); Cosmos Latinos: An Anthology of Science Fiction from Latin America and Spain (2004); Afro-Future Females (2008); Walking the Clouds: An Anthology of Indigenous Science Fiction (2012); AfroSF (2013) and AfroSFv2 (2015); Mothership: Tales from Afrofuturism and Beyond (2013); We See a Different Frontier: A Postcolonial Speculative Fiction Anthology (2013); and Iraq + 100: Stories from a Century After the Invasion (2015). Jessica Langer’s Postcolonialism and Science Fiction (2009) was an early engagement with empire and race in contemporary SF in film, literature, and videogames; around the same time, John Rieder’s Colonialism and the Emergence of Science Fiction (2008) traced SF’s origins to the colonial adventure stories of late-nineteenth-century writers like H. Rider Haggard. More recently, Eric D. Smith’s Globalization, Utopia and Postcolonial Science Fiction: New Maps of Hope (2012) discusses the Utopian import of contemporary SF from the peripheries of the world-system. Various periodicals have also broadened the SF debate beyond Anglophone metropolitan writers, especially Science Fiction Studies, which has featured special issues on ‘Global Science Fiction’ (March 2000), Slipstream (March 2011), Afrofuturism (July 2007), SF and globalisation (November 2012), Chinese SF (March 2013), and Indian SF (November 2016). Meanwhile, special issues on African SF have featured in Paradoxa (2013) and The Cambridge Journal of Postcolonial Literary Inquiry (2016).

